Africa: Increasing Weight in the Global Arena

Key Takeaway

Africa during the past 20 years has increasingly integrated into the international community, which presents opportunities for expanded engagement in ways that advance US economic and security interests. Africa’s demographic potential, supply of natural resources, and potential collective political and economic leverage are deepening its importance in the evolving international system, despite the pandemic-related disruptions to near-term growth.

- International integration measures across Sub-Saharan Africa, while low compared to other regions of the world, have steadily increased during the past 20 years, judging from a study commissioned by the NIC. The increasing globalization of Sub-Saharan Africa creates opportunities to promote greater adherence to international norms, resulting in improved governance, conflict mitigation, and market access.

- African participation in internal and international multilateral institutions offers an opportunity to amplify efforts to advance US interests on the continent and beyond. The African Union is a maturing, continent-wide organization that serves as a focal point for African coordination and mediation on intra-continental issues, presenting a possible inroad into multinational cooperation on key issues. African nations represent the largest regional voting bloc at the UN and have often voted against the United States on key issues, according to a review of voting coincidence between 2016 and 2019.

- African publics have welcomed the growing number of external actors that are increasing their presence and deepening ties across the continent, and they have maintained largely favorable views of the United States for at least the past 10 years, according to State Department-sponsored polling.
(U) Compared with other world regions between 2000–17, Sub-Saharan Africa had the second-lowest level of globalization but the second greatest increase in globalization.

Social
Sub-Saharan Africa’s high growth rates in informational and interpersonal globalization, compared with the rest of the world, showcase the region’s increase in technology exports, migration, travel, international tourism, and access to TV and telephone. For example, African students studying abroad increased by 111 percent between 2006 and 2016.

Political
Compared with the rest of the world, Sub-Saharan Africa experienced greater increases in political globalization, which most likely illustrates a diversification of partnerships during the time frame.

Economic
Sub-Saharan Africa had especially low economic globalization scores with the second smallest increase in trade globalization and the smallest increase in financial globalization of all regions.

(U) Although the COVID-19 pandemic is likely to cause significant disruption in the next two years, Sub-Saharan Africa’s upward—if uneven—globalization trajectory probably will continue in the next five years. The recent establishment of the African Continental Free Trade Area (AfCFTA) could help bolster lagging social and political globalization in the coming decades.

Ongoing conflict in the Sahel and semi-authoritarian practices in West Africa are likely to continue to temper the region’s upward globalization trajectory.

Enduring authoritarianism and high levels of conflict in parts of East Africa are likely to continue to hamper globalization processes in the region.

Southern Africa leads in all aspects of globalization and with relatively high levels of democracy and low levels of conflict, this region is likely to continue on an upward trajectory of globalization.

Central Africa is likely to stay on a trajectory of slow or stagnant globalization.
The African Union (AU) is a maturing, continent-wide organization that serves as a focal point for African solutions for an integrated, prosperous, and peaceful Africa. The AU’s Agenda 2063—Africa’s blueprint for transforming Africa into the global powerhouse of the future—is ambitious and was already experiencing setbacks in its first decade of implementation, which COVID-19 magnified. On security, there is one ongoing AU mission in Somalia.

Africa’s Regional Economic Communities

Regional integration in Africa, while low compared to other regions of the world, is increasing and has the potential to expand markets and trade, foster sociocultural cooperation, and improve regional stability. Building on Africa’s Regional Economic Communities (RECs), the AU established the AfCFTA, which is expected to establish a multitrillion dollar economic block in the future.

(U) Public Perceptions of External Actors, 2019–20

Majorities in half or more of the African publics surveyed had favorable views of the United States, China, France, Russia, and Saudi Arabia, judging from State Department sponsored polling. This polling highlights that African publics tend to prefer a choice of partners and do not necessarily have a "partner of choice." Polling suggests that populations are less familiar with Iran, Russia, and Saudi Arabia, based on the high number of people polled who did not offer an opinion.

Publics’ Favorable Perceptions of the United States in Selected Countries, 2010–20

(African public perceptions towards the United States tend to be largely favorable. The following case studies show that positive perceptions of the United States have stayed somewhat steady during the past decade in key bilateral partners such as Kenya and Nigeria; while in Morocco, positive perceptions of the United States fell to less than 50 percent for the first time in 2020.
